LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT

This issue of The Record features stories about the vitality of our College's educational program, the accomplishments of our students, the work of our dedicated faculty and staff, and the talents and devotion of our alumni. All of these stories reflect Hampden-Sydney's commitment to living into, and living out, its mission "to form good men and good citizens." And, no story better reflects this commitment than the tribute to the life of Walter "Shorty" Simms, one of the finest Hampden-Sydney men of all time.

The following pages also include examples of the College's ongoing momentum toward ensuring access to a Hampden-Sydney education for future generations of young men and strengthening the College's academic and co-curricular programs. Since the last issue of The Record, Hampden-Sydney has been blessed to receive a generous grant from the Carpenter Foundation for need-based financial aid endowment, as well as a remarkable gift from Bill '72 and Shireen Kirk to endow our athletic program. Both gifts come with the requirement that the College raise matching funds, so we are asking alumni, parents, and friends of the College to follow the example set by these generous benefactors.

The College has received some noteworthy accolades over the last few months, including recognition by The Wall Street Journal as one of the nation's top-ten schools for career preparation. Our high score in this category reflects the hard work of faculty mentors and the College's Ferguson Career Center staff. It also underscores the value of a Hampden-Sydney education and the return students and their parents can expect to receive from their investment.

The Wall Street Journal rankings were derived from a survey of college students nationwide, and Hampden-Sydney received additional high scores in the areas of student satisfaction and inspiration based on two very important questions. One of these asked, "If you could start over, would you still choose this college?" while the other asked, "Does your college provide an environment where you feel you are surrounded by exceptional students who inspire and motivate you?" On this latter question, we narrowly missed the "top ten," and I am very proud of our score on this important dimension because it reflects so positively on our academic program and the ideals of brotherhood and camaraderie we seek to foster at Hampden-Sydney. Please share Hampden-Sydney's great scores on all three of these ranking items with prospective students and their families, guidance counselors, and teachers in your area.

It is my hope that Hampden-Sydney's recent recognition and fundraising success will inspire you to even greater levels of devotion to and pride in our great College.

Dr. Larry Stimpert
President, Hampden-Sydney College

TIGER INN

BROWN STUDENT CENTER

On November 3, 2017, the Hampden-Sydney College community gathered to dedicate H-SC's latest campus addition, the Brown Student Center, which has quickly become a community hub for students, faculty, staff, and campus residents alike.

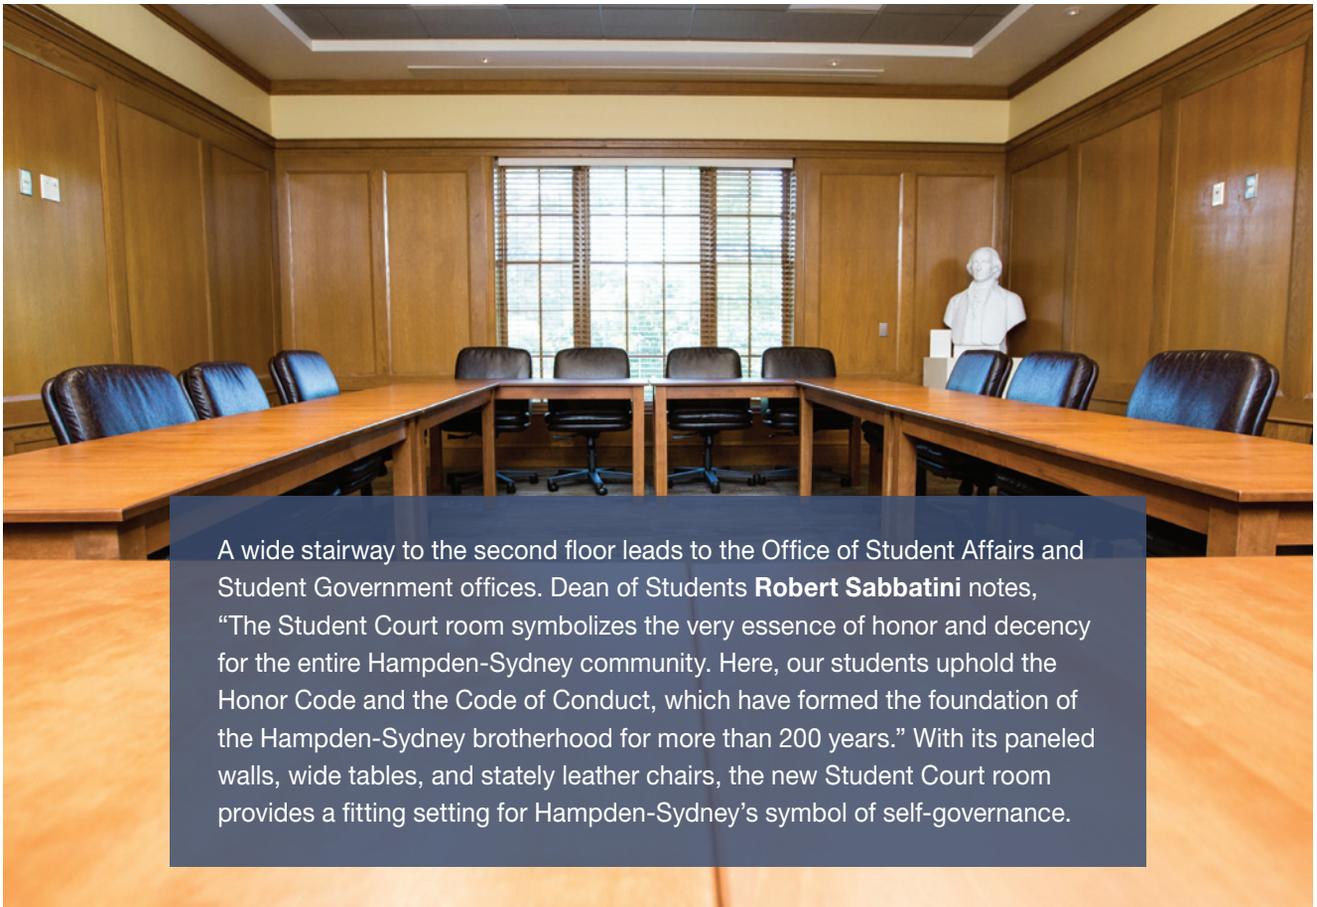

A need first identified in the College's 2012 Campus Master Plan—a centralized space for student services, activities, and casual common areas—has come to fruition in the $11-million student center. Construction began on the 26,000-square-foot facility, located on the site of the former Eggleston Library, in February of 2016 and was completed on schedule this summer. Services such as the post office and career education moved into the new building in June, but it was the return of students for the fall semester and the grand opening of the Tiger Inn on August 18 that brought Hampden-Sydney's Brown Student Center to life.

Featuring classic red brick, white trim, and a Greek-Revival portico, the Brown Student Center's Via Sacra entrance maintains the traditional look and feel of the Hampden-Sydney campus. Situated just inside the front entrance are two of the College's flagship programs: the Fleming Center for Entrepreneurship and Innovation on the right and the Ferguson Career Center on the left. Relocating the two centers from separate academic buildings to the Student Center makes their services even more accessible to students. The first floor flows seamlessly into more casual space at the building's rear—an overlook of the two-story stone fireplace on the ground floor; hang-out spaces to play pool, pingpong, or video games on the big screen TV; meeting rooms for clubs and organizations; locker storage space; and more.

The Flemming Center for Entrepreneurship and Innovation was established in May 2017 with a $1-million gift from Todd Flemming '85 and the Flemming Foundation. The Center's new facility features a "flex office" for students to collaborate with faculty and visiting entrepreneurs—even the walls function as whiteboards to foster creativity. A state-of-the-art economics classroom, a conference room for the Tiger Fund, and offices for the Center's Director and the newly-endowed Entrepreneur-in-Residence complete the space. According to Interim Director Justin P. Isaacs '95, "The facility gives students the opportunity to think, reflect, and develop their ideas for new ventures in a space that is both functional and conducive to collaboration. The fact that students are always walking through the building provides a high level of energy, as well." To learn more, visit hsc.edu/entrepreneur-in-residence.

A wide stairway to the second floor leads to the Office of Student Affairs and Student Government offices. Dean of Students Robert Sabbatini notes, “The Student Court room symbolizes the very essence of honor and decency for the entire Hampden-Sydney community. Here, our students uphold the Honor Code and the Code of Conduct, which have formed the foundation of the Hampden-Sydney brotherhood for more than 200 years.” With its paneled walls, wide tables, and stately leather chairs, the new Student Court room provides a fitting setting for Hampden-Sydney’s symbol of self-governance.

A brick patio with ample outdoor seating and solar charging stations forms the eastern entrance, and two-story windows fill the ground floor with natural light. Comfortable seating areas flanking the stone fireplace—its mantle constructed from a circa-1822 beam from Cushing Hall—have quickly become favorite spots for students to work or relax. The post office features additional seating areas and echoes the feel of Graham Hall with classic brass post office boxes. Design elements like a reclaimed-wood wall, floor-to-ceiling windows, and wood-burning fire pits overlooking Chalgrove Lake update the Tiger Inn, while large-screen televisions, leather couches, and a wood-and-brass bar retain its classic pub vibe.

GOOD MEN, GOOD CITIZENS, GREAT COACHES

H-SC

KAREN E. HUGGARD

In the midst of growing scandals that would eventually rock the college basketball world and take down one of the NCAA's most powerful coaches, not one but two Hampden-Sydney men received national recognition for their character and leadership in collegiate basketball. Russell Turner '92 and Ryan Odom '96 were named finalists for the 2017 Skip Prosser Man of the Year Award, presented annually by CollegeInsider.com to a Division I head coach "who achieves success on the basketball court, while displaying great moral integrity off of the court, as well."

That two Hampden-Sydney hoops players from the same era would go on to successful careers in the high-stakes world of Division I athletics is, of course, impressive—there are only 347 head coaches in all of Division I men's basketball. But equally impressive is the manner in which these Hampden-Sydney men have carried the College's mission into that world, passing on the lessons they learned about honor and excellence as Hampden-Sydney Tigers some twenty years ago.

THE BIG TIME

Both Turner and Odom pursued careers in coaching immediately upon graduation from H-SC, but each took a different path to a head coaching position. For Turner, currently in his eighth season as head coach at the University of California-Irvine (UCI), the journey included assistant coaching positions at almost every level of competitive basketball: high school, college, and the NBA. In six seasons at Wake Forest University and four seasons at Stanford University, he made a total of seven visits to the NCAA Tournament and two appearances in the Elite Eight; six seasons with the NBA's Golden State Warriors saw two rounds of postseason play. And as a head coach, Turner was named Big West Conference Coach of the Year in 2014 and led UCI to its first NCAA Tournament appearance in 2015.

Odom, on the other hand, has spent his entire career in collegiate basketball, almost exclusively at Division I universities. Seven years as an assistant coach at Virginia Tech and another five at UNC-Charlotte included two rounds in the NCAA Tournament; in his one year as head coach at Division II Lenoir-Rhyne University, he took the team to the Elite Eight. Now entering his second season at the University of Maryland-Baltimore County (UMBC), Odom was named the nation's top first-year Division I head coach in 2017 by CollegeInsider.com and led UMBC to its first three postseason wins in school history at the CIT Tournament.

After a year assisting legendary coach Tony Shaver at Hampden-Sydney (where he coached a young Durant "Dee" Vick '94 and an even younger Ryan Odom, helping lead the Tigers to the Division III Sweet Sixteen), Turner spent six years at ACC powerhouse Wake Forest under Odom's father, three-time ACC Coach of the Year Dave Odom. With that experience came the opportunity to develop one of the most decorated players to emerge from Wake Forest: future NBA-great Tim Duncan. Turner's time with the Golden State Warriors brought a similar opportunity to coach NBA-superstar Stephen Curry. "Not too many people have been lucky enough to work with two guys who have been two-time NBA MVPs," notes Turner. "Tim and Steph are both grounded with values that I admire, and that contributed to them being great teammates and successful people. Both are men of incredible character who have great minds for the game, a passion for basketball, and a focus on improvement."

Turner calls his time in the NBA "the most exhilarating and exciting of my life." He continues, "Coaching at that level was an amazing learning experience. The players are the most driven and committed I've ever seen, and they're appreciative of coaching." He left the NBA to return to collegiate athletics, however, believing that was where he could make a difference. "People ask me, 'What's it like in the big time?' I truly believe the big time is where you are. For me, if it's important enough for young athletes to engage every day, to work to improve, to accomplish something as a team, to work for something bigger than the team—that's big time."

CHARACTER COUNTS

For Odom, the initial draw to a graduate assistant job with the University of South Florida's basketball team was a chance to remain connected to the game he loves. "I wasn't ready to give the game up when my time playing at Hampden-Sydney was done," he says. And as the son of a now-retired basketball coaching legend, he was familiar with the profession. What began as a way to extend his time on the court quickly morphed into a calling, though. Odom explains, "First I loved seeing the other side of the game, then I began to understand the impact coaches can have on these kids at a meaningful time in their lives. That's not something I take lightly, and that's why I'm still coaching today."

"YOUR CHARACTER DEFINES WHO YOU ARE, AND YOU CAN'T BE WILLING TO SACRIFICE YOUR INTEGRITY FOR SHORT-TERM GAINS."

—Ryan Odom '96

In fact, it was character development that drew Turner back to collegiate sports after his six-year foray into the NBA. He explains, "Mentorship is a huge part of why I do what I do—but the NBA is a business that's entirely about winning. College sports are different; we're coaching guys at the time when their character and leadership qualities are developing. It's fun to help build qualities that will lead to more success, but it's also rewarding to teach guys to be resilient when they face a lack of success. More than wins and losses, what matters to me as a coach is to see improvement in the people I'm working with."

"Setting high expectations to be the best version of yourself you can be, upholding strong values—it's easy to argue that there's not enough of that in the world today," says Turner, who has incorporated aspects of the Hampden-Sydney tradition into his program, specifically the Honor Code. "It's a rather anachronistic idea in 2017, but I can't stress enough the importance of Hampden-Sydney's Honor Code, which I've carried over into my own program. Every week, my players have to sign an honor statement that directs them clearly toward our values. That practice comes directly from my experience at Hampden-Sydney."

At UMBC, Odom is also building a values-based program. "Competitive sports are a great teacher: our players learn to work well with others, contribute to an overall team, practice humility, and deal with adversity," he says. "We attack one of our six core values each day, and we as coaches try to live them out in our daily lives. We try to model thankfulness, humility, servanthood, passion, accountability, and unity for our student-athletes." This approach has led to success on the court, with UMBC earning the second-most wins in school history during Odom's first season as head coach.

But a winning record only matters if it has been achieved the right way. "Your character defines who you are, and you can't be willing to sacrifice your integrity for short-term gains," Odom says. Talking about recent allegations of corruption and bribery in NCAA basketball, he notes, "I'm in this profession to mentor kids so they're ready for life after basketball, but unfortunately not everybody is. Like any profession, there are people of integrity who do things the right way, and there are others who don't." Odom continues, "We need to band together as a coaching profession to make sure we're all in it for the right reasons, because we're in charge of these kids at a time in their lives when we can really make a positive—or negative—impact."

A BASKETBALL BROTHERHOOD

A conversation with either Odom or Turner about their own coaching philosophies will inevitably return to one name: Tony Shaver. According to Turner, Shaver "created an environment where everyone was challenged to grow," and that growth wasn't on the basketball court alone. "Coach Shaver had a tremendous influence on me as a man and a leader. Basketball is what initially drew us together, but even more so were the values he shared with us: integrity, excellence, and a commitment to family," says Turner.

Russell Turner's six seasons with the NBA included the opportunity to coach two-time NBA MVP Stephen Curry.

Former H-SC teammates Dee Vick and Scott "Griff" Aldrich '96 have also continued Shaver's legacy in the coaching profession: Vick, Shaver's assistant coach at William & Mary for five years, is now head coach at Hampden-Sydney, while Aldrich serves as Odom's head of basketball operations at UMBC. Turner calls Vick "a difference-making coach" and "an integral part of the fabric of Hampden-Sydney College"; Odom says Aldrich plays "a vital role in developing athletes on and off the court." He continues, "I want coaches on my staff who have integrity, who will mentor the guys, and whose values and character I respect—Griff is all of that."

Noting the number of Hampden-Sydney men from the Shaver era who are making an impact in the profession, Odom explains, "It all goes back to Coach Shaver. We love the game because of the experience we had playing for him at Hampden-Sydney and the values he instilled in us." Now, as peers in the coaching world, both Odom and Turner remain in close contact with Shaver. "There are certain people in your life that you rely on for counsel as a man and as a professional," says Turner. "Coach Tony Shaver is one of those people for me." Odom says he talks to Shaver about once a month, and enjoys seeing him on the road occasionally: "He and my father [Dave Odom] were my role models and really shaped the man I've become. I feel fortunate to have the opportunity to honor them now by how I coach."

BRAINS AND BRAWN

Asked how relevant his Hampden-Sydney education is to his coaching career, Odom responds without hesitation: "Do I use it every day? Absolutely." He explains, "The discipline that it takes to earn a college degree—to be on top of things, to be organized, to do it every day—shapes who you become later on. At Hampden-Sydney, I was challenged off the court academically and on the court athletically, which gave me the discipline and focus that I needed to be successful." Odom applies that discipline and focus as he juggles the demands of a head coach: mentoring and developing players, managing a coaching staff, building a team culture—all while traveling near and far for competition and recruiting.

He also appreciates the College's rhetoric program, which he puts into daily use, as well. "Not a lot of colleges or universities have a program like Hampden-Sydney's to teach students how to write and speak well, yet those skills are so important in the professional world," Odom says. "As a coach, I communicate every day with players, boosters, university administration, and the press—and I can't risk being misunderstood or sending the wrong message. Hampden-Sydney students may not enjoy the rhetoric exam, but there's no doubt the program teaches them to communicate effectively and helps them after graduation."

Turner agrees: "There's no disputing that a liberal arts education, with its focus on critical thinking, is valuable. But the way Hampden-Sydney presents that education is particularly valuable because of the focus on writing and communication. What I do absolutely requires critical thinking," he says, "but the most important skill in my profession is the ability to communicate effectively."

At Hampden-Sydney, Turner was a standout in the classroom as well as on the hardwood: with a double major in Economics and English, he graduated magna cum laude and was inducted into Phi Beta Kappa. "I was just a country kid from Roanoke, so Hampden-Sydney was a tremendous growth experience for me," says Turner. "I had never experienced teachers who could capture my interest enough to sustain high-level performance. The professors at Hampden-Sydney brought subjects to life and engaged my attention, though; that excited me and had an impact on my life." Turner's career has been spent at institutions with strong academic reputations—like Stanford and Wake Forest—which has only increased his appreciation for his own education. "I've often said I would stack my Hampden-Sydney education up against what's available at any school I've worked at, and I've been a part of some pretty good schools," he says with understatement.

Hampden-Sydney alumni often look back at their formative years on the Hill with nostalgia, and these coaches are no exception. "It's hard to express the amount of appreciation I feel," says Turner. "Hampden-Sydney has been a tremendous part of my journey." Odom echoes the sentiment. "I'm appreciative of the time and energy that the Hampden-Sydney community invested in me: the professors were caring, the coaches were influential, and the friendships are lifelong. I loved every second of my time at Hampden-Sydney."

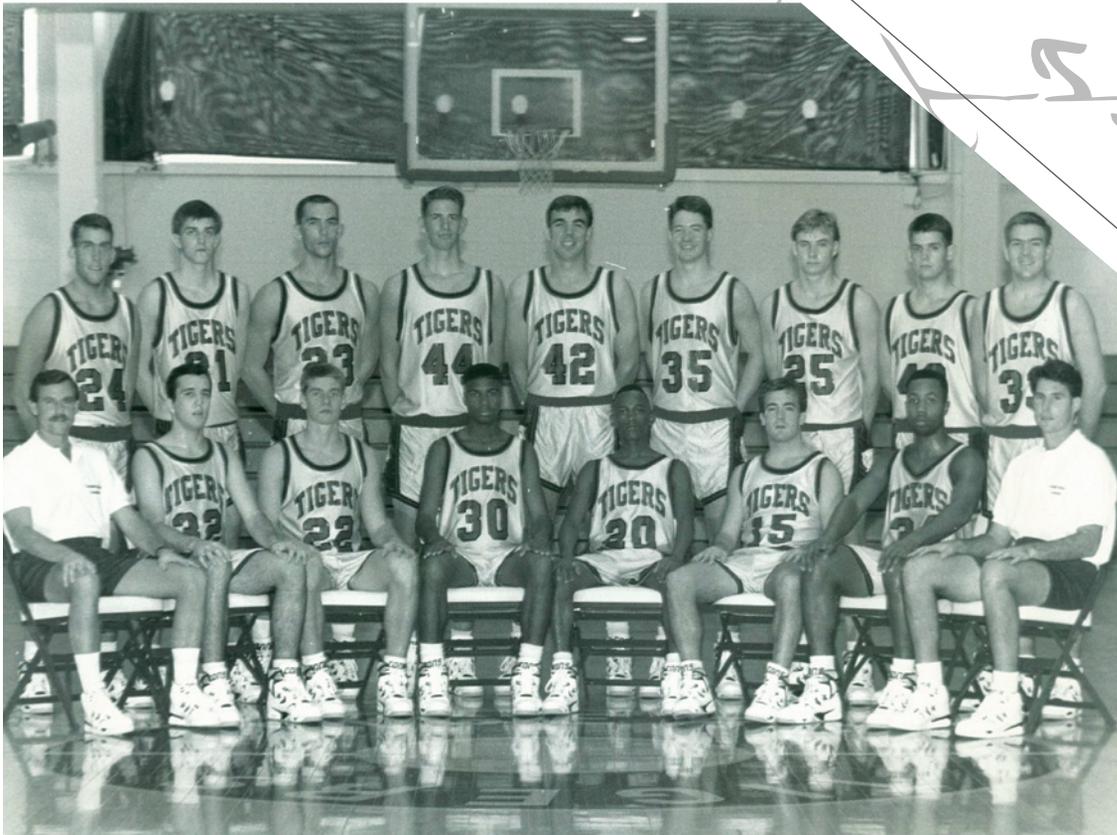

Turner's and Odom's success in the coaching profession speaks to the power of a Hampden-Sydney education, and their recent nominations for Man of the Year are proof that the College's enduring mission to "form good men and good citizens" continues to spread far beyond our gates—even on the hardwood. 🏀

In between recruiting trips this fall, Russell Turner (left) returned to the Hill to visit his former teammate, H-SC head coach Dee Vick (right).

PUBLIC SERVICE IN THE SHADOWS TREY LACKEY '86

KAREN E. HUGGARD

A quick Google search for Hal V. “Trey” Lackey III ’86 yields almost no hits—surprising in this age of instant information and social media interaction, especially given the H-SC alumnus’ successful career as a public servant.

In fact, Lackey has returned to the College frequently over the years as a member of the Wilson Center for Leadership Board of Advisors, but he notes that “for the longest time when I was on campus for a lecture or a panel discussion, I really couldn’t talk about what I did, or even where I worked.”

This September, however, Lackey was able to acknowledge his 25 years with the Clandestine Service of the Central Intelligence Agency when he gave the keynote address at the Wilson Center’s 9-11 commemoration. Although the former operations officer cannot give specifics about his work with the CIA, broadly speaking he ran operations across multiple regions and in three conflict zones throughout Europe, South Asia, and the Middle East.

The CIA website describes an operations officer’s job as “clandestinely spotting, assessing, developing, recruiting, and handling non-US-citizens having access to foreign intelligence vital to US foreign policy and national security decision-makers. Operations Officers (OOs) build relationships based on rapport and trust using sound judgment, integrity, and the ability to assess character and motivation. All OOs address a highly diverse and dynamic set of intelligence requirements on country- and region-specific issues, as well as transnational issues such as counterterrorism, counterproliferation, and cyber [security].”

It is a job that Lackey was well-prepared for with his Hampden-Sydney degree. “It’s difficult to think of a better preparation for the job than a liberal arts education,” Lackey claims. “What makes a successful operations officer? Strong interpersonal and communication skills, the ability to assess situations and people, and intellectual curiosity—a trait I certainly didn’t have when I arrived at Hampden-Sydney, but had really developed by the time I graduated.”

His background as a history major proved vital to Lackey’s success, as well. “Professors like Ron Heinemann, Jim Simms, and John Brinkley taught me how to put things in historical context,” he says, “and when you’re in South Asia or the Middle East, it’s much easier to understand what’s going on in the moment if you have that sense of history.” He also found inspiration from one of the College’s most revered presidents, General Samuel V. Wilson. “I wanted my work to be intellectually substantive, and General Sam Wilson was a great example of that,” says Lackey. “Wherever I went, I got to know the culture and language, developed close relationships with the local people, and really threw myself into it intellectually.”

Although the bulk of Lackey’s career was spent overseas, his few domestic assignments included a year at the White House on the National Security Council staff—spanning the final months of George W. Bush’s presidency and the first months of Barack Obama’s presidency—as well as 14 months at the FBI as then-Director James Comey’s national security liaison. He calls both experiences fascinating, but in the fall of 2016 he made the decision to retire from government service and transition to the private sector. He is now an executive in the homeland security group at CSRA, an information technology and cybersecurity firm where he works with fellow H-SC alumni Donald Robinson ’02 and Tom Doheny ’07.

Speaking to the Hampden-Sydney community about “Re-imagining a Safer World” on the 16th anniversary of the September 11th terror attacks, Lackey laid out what he feels are the most significant geopolitical and domestic challenges facing the nation, ranging from North Korea to the opioid crisis. Although the solutions are complex, he says an active and engaged government that utilizes both hard and soft power is vital, as is the involvement of the business sector, nongovernmental organizations, and mission groups.

In addition, Lackey encouraged Americans to rediscover the national unity that he feels has frayed over the last decade. “In times of crisis like 9-11 or Hurricane Irma, Americans come together and support each other well,” he explains, “but in recent years there has been an exploitation of our differences rather than an emphasis on our unity. We need to rejuvenate our sense of civic unity and develop institutions that bind us together beyond the times of crisis.”

Lackey ended his address by challenging Hampden-Sydney students to think critically and creatively, to push their personal boundaries and leave their comfort zones: “Looking back on my career, I traveled the world, worked closely with two presidents, met world leaders—and I was just an average, small-town Virginia guy at Hampden-Sydney. The lesson is to take chances, think unconventionally, and push yourself to do something you never imagined.” 🇺🇸

HAMPDEN-SYDNEY WELCOMES THREE NEW MEMBERS TO BOARD OF TRUSTEES

Mr. Eric E. Apperson '85 is the president of Armada Hoffler Construction Company. After working at Hampden-Sydney College as an assistant dean of admissions, he began his career with Armada Hoffler in 1987, holding various positions before becoming president of Goodman Segar Hogan Hoffler Construction in 1997. Because of his wide range of management experience, in 2000 he was appointed president of Armada Hoffler Construction, where he is responsible for the overall management, strategic growth, and financial health of the company.

Apperson sits on the Cape Henry Collegiate Board of Trustees and is a former member of the Hampden-Sydney Alumni Association Board of Directors. Since 2007, he has been a member of the Board of Directors of Bank @lantec, a division of Dollar Bank, serving as its Chairman since 2010. He also sits on the bank's Virginia Advisory Board. He and his wife Lynn live in Virginia Beach and have two children: Brooks, a senior at Hampden-Sydney, and Virginia, a freshman at Santa Clara University in California.

Mr. Robert K. Citrone '87 is the founder, managing member, and sole principal of Discovery Capital Management, LLC. He has been advising and managing portfolios focused on global and emerging market investments since 1990, first at Fidelity Investments, where he built and ran the Emerging Market Fixed Income and Currency Group, then at Tiger Management, where he was responsible for strategic investment recommendations on currencies, fixed income, and equities. Citrone formed Discovery Capital Management in 1999; he is the portfolio manager for the Discovery fund structures: Discovery Global Opportunity Funds, Discovery Global Citizens Funds, Discovery Global Focus Funds, and Discovery Global Macro Funds (the "Funds").

Citrone holds an MBA from the Darden School at the University of Virginia, where he graduated as a Shermet Scholar (top 10 in his class). He was the valedictorian of his class at Hampden-Sydney, earning his bachelor's degree with honors in math and economics. He and his wife Cindy have four children.

Mr. John Claiborne "Clay" Sifford '94 is the founder and CEO of LASSO, a privately-held workforce management software company dedicated to helping companies manage their project-based, mobile workforce. The Wall Street Journal ranks Hampden-Sydney tenth in the nation for career preparation.

INTERNSHIPS TAKE H-SC STUDENTS AROUND THE GLOBE

Paid internships at Fortune-500 companies, volunteer work at non-profits, and alumni-sponsored internships in multiple sectors took H-SC students from Africa to Asia, proving that a Hampden-Sydney education extends far beyond the confines of a classroom. Below is just a snapshot of the diverse opportunities the young Tigers pursued this summer. It's no surprise that in its 2017 rankings, The Wall Street Journal named Hampden-Sydney College number ten among top schools for career preparation.

Find additional Hampden-Sydney student summer stories at hsc.edu/student-summer.

Economics and business student Josh Katowitz '18 landed an internship with IBM Transformations and Operations at Research Triangle Park in Raleigh, North Carolina. In his work gathering and analyzing contract information for the client services procurement team, Josh had the chance to work with IBM's Watson supercomputer. He says, "I got real-life experience working at a Fortune 500 company, collaborating with people across the globe and enhancing my people skills." Josh will continue to put those skills to work for IBM after his graduation from Hampden-Sydney—at the end of his internship he received and accepted a job offer to be an IBM procurement professional in June 2018.

Sam Fleming '19, also an economics and business major, took a break from the business world to compete with the Carolina Crown Drum and Bugle Corps, a position he secured after three competitive auditions. Playing the snare drum in the 150-member drum corps, Sam performed for crowds ranging from 5,000 to 25,000 people; the corps' three-month, national tour of over 30 cities included stops in Orlando, Boston, and San Antonio. Sam and his teammates capped off the summer with a bronze medal at the world championship finals, held August 12 at Lucas Oil Stadium, home of the Indianapolis Colts and site of the 2012 Super Bowl.

Interning with a small non-profit in South Africa, Austin Hays Hardman '18 put both of his majors to work: foreign affairs and religion. Austin's internship with Abba's Pride, which partners with churches to provide primary education in rural South Africa, taught him first-hand about non-profit organizations, sustainable development, and African culture. He was even able to formulate and implement his own project, a playground he built for preschool children in a rural area of the Limpopo Province. Austin calls the opportunity "the experience of a lifetime—one that would have been impossible without Hampden-Sydney's internship scholarship program and committed professors who go above and beyond." Austin is pictured with preschool children enjoying the playground that he built.

Kyle Burns '18 and Thomas Carswell '18 learned the value of H-SC's alumni network at internships sponsored by Bartow Morgan, Jr. '94, CEO of BrandBank and a Trustee of the College. Working in the Atlanta bank's credit department, they completed both individual and group projects and presented them to the BrandBank Board of Investors. Kyle calls the internship "a superior educational and networking opportunity that offered valuable experience in the banking and business fields. Mr. Morgan even hosted a large number of business and community leaders at his home to enhance the interns' networks." Thomas (left) and Kyle (right) are pictured with the famous Coca-Cola Bear at Atlanta's World of Coca-Cola.

Wesley Kuegler '18, a computer science and biology student, landed a paid internship at NASA's Langley Research Center in Hampton, where he developed a simulator platform for rapid testing of atmospheric instrumentation to be used on the Mars 2020 rover's descent vehicle. "While it was exciting to work on a project that would directly impact a Mars exploration mission," he says, "what impressed me most was the massive scope of the projects. NASA has an almost singular ability to direct the intellectual power of its tens of thousands of employees towards advancing human space exploration, and I was genuinely awed to be a part of it." On the right are Wes and the other NASA interns and fellows at Langley.

H-SC sophomore Colin Penn '20 spent the summer as a customer care intern at the headquarters of Hooker Furniture in Martinsville, where he enjoyed learning about the furniture business and customer relations. He interacted with Hooker Furniture's corporate office, distribution facilities, and manufacturing facilities in both Virginia and North Carolina. He also participated in the employee sale, with all proceeds benefiting the local Boys and Girls Clubs and SPCA. Colin's internship connected him with Ronnie E. Fultz III '12, the assistant manager of supply chain operations at Hooker; in the photo, Fultz (left) and Colin (right) show their H-SC pride. Colin is also the recipient of the Hooker Educational Scholarship.

Duncan Alexander Keefe '19 traveled to France and Luxembourg as a production assistant for American Rifleman Television, helping film a series about American soldiers who fought in the First World War. The job gave him the opportunity to visit a number of World War II battle sites as well, including Utah Beach, Omaha Beach, and Point du Hoc in Normandy. Duncan says, "It was an experience I'll cherish for years to come. I learned what goes on behind the scenes, giving me a new perspective on how TV shows are crafted and shot." On the right, Duncan and historian Martin K.A. Morgan look down on the Verdun battlefield, where more than 300,000 French and German soldiers were killed in 1916.

Zane Moody '18 traveled across the globe to work alongside Ivy League law students at an international law firm in Singapore this summer. The prestigious internship at White and Case—sponsored by Barrye Wall '78, a partner at the firm, and arranged by Dr. David Marion, director of the Wilson Center's Public Service Program—confirmed the government major's desire to pursue a law degree upon graduation. He spent the five-week internship researching the energy business sector, ascertaining the viability of mergers and acquisitions, and putting his rhetoric training to work as an editor. Student Research SPOTLIGHT

“At Hampden-Sydney, we are working to provide experiential learning opportunities for our students,” says Dr. Michael Wolyniak, director of the College’s Office of Undergraduate Research. “Our summer research program is experiential learning in its purest form: students take what they’ve learned in class and apply it independently to a problem. In the process, we see them develop their own ideas and really flourish.” The College sponsored 32 student research projects on campus this summer in both the humanities and the sciences. In this issue, The Record spotlights the research of two seniors, both biology majors and chemistry minors, who hope to pursue graduate work after Hampden-Sydney.

SEAN WALDEN '18 tackled a problem that poses a significant economic threat to the beer industry: fungal infections in Humulus lupulus—the common hop plant. In recent years, several H-SC students have studied hops and the downy mildew that attacks them, but Sean was particularly interested in studying the plants’ own defenses as a potential fungicide—a natural alternative to current fungicides that seep copper into the soil and groundwater.

His research focused on the essential oils found in hops cones, the source of beer’s distinct flavor and aroma as well as a natural defense against pests and other threats. After reading a study on the anti-fungal qualities of other essential oils, Sean wondered if the hop plant might produce an essential oil to combat infection. Its application could extend well beyond hops to other commercial crops threatened by fungus—a potentially lucrative discovery.

Sean’s eight-week project established an essential oil profile for the Citra hop varietal. The process involved flash freezing hops cones with liquid nitrogen, pulverizing the frozen cones, placing them in a hexane solvent, then distilling the essential oils. He used the College’s gas chromatograph mass spectrometer (GC-MS) to identify the molecules in the distilled essential oils.

As he works toward earning biology departmental distinction, Sean will continue his research throughout his senior year, testing if the specific essential oils he identified this summer stunt the growth of fungal cultures. Although developing a commercially viable fungicide would take years of research, Sean hopes he’s laying the groundwork for future essential oil-based fungicides.

PERSUS OKOWUAH '18 studied native plants and invasive species, inspired in part by the landscape he passes through between campus and his home in Northern Virginia. "Everywhere you look as you drive south, you see fields of native clover, which will eventually disappear if we don't find a way to control invasive plants," he explains. He is particularly interested in combating invasive species without resorting to pesticides, which damage native plants and seep into groundwater.

A field study of the Farmville area turned Persus' attention to the invasive Centaurea stoebe (knap weed) and the native Lespedeza capitata (bush clover), which share similar root structures and compete for soil resources. His experiment, conducted in the greenhouse behind Gilmer Hall, involved 128 plants grown from locally harvested seeds.

The research has several immediate applications. In particular, Persus found that disturbed soil, like that found on construction sites and near road work, benefits the invasive weed to the detriment of native plants; the introduction of clover, however, keeps the knap weed in check and helps other native species survive, as well. Understanding and adjusting to that dynamic early can prevent the development of a large-scale problem like the current invasion of kudzu in the southeast.

But Persus found another, unexpected application for his research a little farther away from home. Noting that invasive species thrive in soil with few nutrients, Persus thought of recent experiments with Martian soil: "NASA has tried to grow plants like lettuce in Martian soil, but found that the produce lacks nutrients. Why don't we terraform the soil by having these invasive species come up first, thus changing the soil composition?"

H-SC HIRES NEW ATHLETIC DIRECTOR

Hampden-Sydney's new director of athletics joins the Tigers after 25 years working in collegiate athletics, as both a coach and an administrator. Chad Eisele's career has included stints at a variety of institutions—public and private, large and small, urban and rural—all of which have prepared him to take the helm of Hampden-Sydney athletics.

Several of Hampden-Sydney's unique attributes drew Eisele to the College, especially its sense of history, athletic legacy, and enduring mission. "There wasn't going to be another opportunity to serve at one of the oldest colleges in the nation," notes Eisele, "and the mission to form good men and good citizens has clearly stood the test of time. From the moment I arrived on campus, it was clear that Hampden-Sydney's mission statement isn't just a slogan on a bumper sticker. Everyone I spoke with—from Trustees, to professors, to coaches, to students—has bought into it completely."

That distinctive mission creates a campus environment that Eisele calls refreshing. He says, "Our students are engaged and confident. When you walk through a lot of other college campuses, students don't look up from their cell phones or take out their ear buds. At Hampden-Sydney, they stop and say hi, shake hands, and introduce themselves."

Eisele comes to H-SC from his own alma mater, a small liberal arts college in Illinois that shares many similarities with Hampden-Sydney. One distinct difference between Knox College and H-SC, however, proved to be another draw for Eisele. "Because Hampden-Sydney is an all-male institution, we get to fully concentrate on just ten teams," he explains. "That frees up a lot of time to invest in the student-athletes' lives, travel with the teams, attend more home games—and not just the high-profile sports like football and basketball."

Twenty-one of Eisele's 25 years in higher education have been spent at Division III schools, and his passion for Division III athletics is clear. "In a non-scholarship program, students participate for the love of the game and to be part of a team," Eisele says. In addition, he appreciates the balance that Division III student-athletes can achieve. "Athletics are an important part of our students' lives, but not the only part. They can still join a fraternity, a theater production, the student senate—they can enjoy all aspects of the college experience."

A key goal for Eisele's first year at the College is to thoroughly evaluate the athletics program—both current use and future needs—focusing on budget, staffing, and facilities. He is impressed with the athletic facilities H-SC boasts: "I would argue that our football and baseball stadiums are some of the top Division III venues in the country, but updating the field house, built almost 40 years ago, is a top priority." And Eisele's ultimate goal will please all fans of Tiger athletics. He says, "I want all ten of our teams to compete for the ODAC Championship, year in and year out."

Eisele's 17 years as a football coach include head coaching positions at Knox College, Minnesota State University-Moorhead, and Lake Forest College, where he took the team to the NCAA Division III playoffs and was named Midwest Conference Coach of the Year in 2002. His collegiate coaching experience extends to baseball and tennis, as well; as head coach of men's tennis, Eisele led Lake Forest to a conference championship. In 2006, Eisele became the athletic director at Knox College, a position he held for more than a decade. During that time, he was appointed to a four-year term on the NCAA Division III Football Committee, an eight-member national committee responsible for evaluating Division III football teams, assisting in the selection of top teams, and creating the national championship bracket.

Eisele holds a master's degree in sports administration from Wayne State University and a bachelor's degree in political science from Knox College, where he competed in track and field, baseball, and football, earning All-Conference distinction three times as a defensive back. 🏆

A CAPTAIN'S ROLE

PAT KLINE '18 EMBRACES SHORTY'S LEGACY

BY AARON KURZ '18

At Hampden-Sydney, our sacred Saturdays are sacred for a reason: we love to celebrate, and we love tradition.

Yet merely two days before the 2017 football opener, the College community was dealt the loss of perhaps the purest embodiment of the spirit that brings so many people through the gates each fall when Walter "Shorty" Simms passed away.

As Shorty made his departure—presumably on his bike—we faced an uneasy transition. How could the Hampden-Sydney family accurately understand his impact? How do we properly celebrate his life and his contribution to the Hampden-Sydney football tradition?

The season opener comes, and the conditions are challenging. Tailgaters wear warm, waterproof boots and fans fill the stadium under the protection of umbrellas and raincoats as kickoff time approaches. The scoreboard flickers, the harsh weather interrupting the power supply. Senior tight end Patrick Kline '18 is one of the captains who strides across the saturated field to meet Averett at the 50 for the coin toss.

For Pat, this moment is the product of years of preparation. His time on campus didn't begin freshman year during summer workouts like most of his teammates', though. "My dad was class of '87," he says, "and I grew up coming to football games with my family. He was one of Shorty's favorite players, so we would always stay with the Simms family."

He continues to explain that his father, Rob Kline '87, was close friends and teammates with Bradley Simms '85, the son of Shorty's brother, J. Scott Simms '61. "They were like brothers. When Brad died in a hunting accident, my dad kind of became another son to Scott."

The Kline family's close relationship with the Simms family was a quality quickly instilled in Pat. To his disappointment, though, Pat's first year on the team was the same year that Shorty transitioned into assisted living. Although he wasn't on the sidelines, Shorty had already managed to give Pat an idea of his unconditional love for Tiger athletics. While Pat was in high school, he and his father came to campus for an official football visit. They were given a thorough tour of the campus, much of which was unfamiliar to Pat, who jokes that he basically grew up in the football stadium and in the Kappa Alpha front yard.

When they got to the dining hall, however, they found a familiar face. "We ate lunch with Shorty, who was so happy to see me and my dad that day. He started reciting all my dad's stats from 30 years ago. Yards, touchdowns—you name it."

Although Shorty never got to see Pat take the field as a Tiger, it's safe to assume that he would have been thrilled to cheer for another Kline.

Scott Simms and his wife Scott Tucker-Simms gather with Pat Kline and his teammates to honor Shorty's memory on the eve of The Game.

Moving forward, the Hampden-Sydney family need not worry about the legacy that Shorty left behind. The man who took Saturday football games on the Hill and turned them into family gatherings is the same man who took such joy in watching Rob Kline play all those years ago—and his spirit lives on in Pat Kline and the next generation of Hampden-Sydney Tigers who played in honor of Shorty on September 2nd.

The story might have been drastically different if Shorty hadn't been the foundation of such a tightly-bound program. "Hampden-Sydney always felt like home," Pat remembers, "and the Simms were always like family. It was such an easy decision to make, coming here, knowing that there's people like that on your team."

It turned out to be a decision that Pat was glad to have made, too, even as the unseasonably cold rain and driving winds persisted throughout the day.

We won, 20-17. Though the power outage temporarily prevented the tradition of keeping the scoreboard lit throughout the night, our first win following Shorty's passing was hard-fought—a fitting tribute to Shorty and his legacy at H-SC. 🏈

Major Gifts Support Scholarships and Athletics

Hampden-Sydney College announced two $4-million gifts this fall, part of on-going efforts to increase scholarship funds, strengthen Tiger athletics, and grow the College's endowment to $200 million by the 2020-21 academic and fiscal year.

In September, the E. Rhodes and Leona B. Carpenter Foundation awarded the College $4 million for the creation of a scholarship endowment to support need-based financial aid for academically qualified students. Then, in October, John W. "Bill" Kirk III '72 and his wife Shireen pledged $4 million to support the endowment of the Hampden-Sydney athletic program.

"The Latin motto on Hampden-Sydney's gates translates to, 'Enter as youths so that you may leave as men,'" said President Larry Stimpert. "The education offered here is transformational, and ensuring access to future generations of Hampden-Sydney men is among our highest institutional priorities. The Carpenter Foundation's generosity will enable many highly qualified young men to experience that transformation. Athletic competition is another critical element of the Hampden-Sydney experience," Stimpert continued, "and Bill and Shireen's support for our athletic endowment strengthens the foundation of our program and ensures a promising future for the young men who don the garnet and grey, as well as the talented staff who coach and mentor them."

Both gifts involve a matching component that will allow the entire H-SC network of alumni, supporters, and friends to be partners in the effort. The Carpenter Foundation's grant will be paid in four annual $1-million installments contingent on the College raising $4 million in cash for each $1-million portion of the Carpenter funds. The Kirk gift will be leveraged as part of a challenge to other Tiger athletic boosters to offer support for the endowments of the athletic department and individual programs. The challenge component requires that two dollars be raised for each dollar of Kirk's pledge.

"The strength of the Hampden-Sydney community and the loyalty of its alumni are two of our strongest qualities, and it is fitting that the full realization of these exceptional gifts will require the support of our entire network of alumni and friends," said Stimpert. With the matching funds, the Carpenter grant will raise $20 million in scholarship endowment, while the Kirk pledge will add $12 million to the athletic endowment. Endowing these programs enables the redeployment of operating budget resources to other key College priorities.

Kirk said his belief in the transformational power of a

Hampden-Sydney education in general, and Tiger athletics in particular, inspired his $4-million pledge. "Hopefully this will inspire many other alumni to give back to the College, as well," he added.

"Hopefully this will inspire many other alumni to give back to the College, as well."

—BILL KIRK '72

During an October visit to campus, Kirk told current Hampden-Sydney students to make the most of their time at H-SC: "You will grow here. You will be challenged to learn, to think, to reason, to make decisions with maturity—and it will take you very far in this world." He continued, "The four years I spent here laid a firm foundation for growth for the rest of my life. I don't think I'd be where I am today if it weren't for my experience at Hampden-Sydney."

The College has a longstanding relationship with the E. Rhodes and Leona B. Carpenter Foundation, founded by E. Rhodes Carpenter, a 1929 graduate of Hampden-Sydney. Bill and Shireen Kirk have been generous supporters of the College and Tiger athletics for many years; Bill currently serves as the vice chair of the Board of Trustees. 🏡

REMEMBERING SHORTY

On August 31, 2017, the Hampden-Sydney College community lost its “best guy” and most loyal fan when longtime campus resident Walter “Shorty” Simms passed away at the age of 70.

Born with Down Syndrome in 1946, Walter moved to Hampden-Sydney in 1971 when his father became the College’s first athletic trainer. From the beginning, Walter was a mainstay at Hampden-Sydney athletic events: cheering on the Tigers from the sidelines, delivering pep talks in the locker room, traveling on the team bus, and working in the gymnasium. His vast store of rock and roll trivia was well-known to several generations of Hampden-Sydney students—he could cite the title, artist, and year for just about any hit from the 50’s and 60’s—but nothing compared to Walter’s prodigious knowledge of Tiger football. Decades after they had left the Hill, Walter could recall former players’ names, jersey numbers, and positions with stunning accuracy.

Although already a legend among members of the Hampden-Sydney community, Walter attracted wider attention when he became the subject of the feature-length documentary Shorty, which followed the Tiger’s 2002 football season through Walter’s eyes and solidified his standing as H-SC’s biggest fan. But director Michael Furno saw him as much more than that: “It is well documented that Shorty was Hampden-Sydney’s super fan,” he said, “but I’ll tell you in no uncertain terms that he was a superstar.” Furno called Walter “an unlikely legend who made a lasting impact on everyone who knew him. It was an honor to be Shorty’s biographer and to share his story with a larger audience through the film.”

Evidence of Walter’s status as an H-SC legend can be found in the public reaction to news of his passing. No other event has elicited such a strong response on the College’s website or social media outlets; his obituary was shared by almost 2,000 Facebook users and reached an audience of 131,155 people—quite an impact for a 70-year-old man who rarely left the Hampden-Sydney campus. College Trustee Jon Daly ’78 established a new scholarship fund and is encouraging other alumni to help him raise $1 million in honor of Walter. And the Richmond Times-Dispatch ran a feature article with the opening lines, “Legends inspire, and then they live forever. Walter ‘Shorty’ Simms will forever be a Hampden-Sydney legend.”

When Walter was born, his parents were told that their son would likely live only into his 20’s, a prognosis they were unwilling to accept. Dr. Gilman Simms ’30 and his wife Julia provided a rich life for Walter, full of opportunity, purpose, love, and acceptance; in return, Walter beat the odds with his health and longevity, exceeding the current life expectancy for individuals with Down Syndrome by more than a decade. His brother J. Scott Simms ’61 attributes Walter’s long life in part to the community that enveloped him from age 25 on. “H-SC was a nurturing community that truly cared for Shorty. Everybody here accepted him as he was and made him a part of campus activity, from a lifetime pass to eat at the dining hall to jobs painting, washing jerseys, and sorting mail.” Walter was a fixture on campus for more than forty years, making daily rounds on his bike—and often sporting a football jersey.

“Walter Simms—that bike riding, stamp collecting, football loving, cafeteria eating, always smiling buddy of a man—quietly showed the world how to be a gentleman and a good citizen through his unconditional respect and love for all,” said Frank Fulton ’79, the nephew of longtime Tiger football coach Stokeley Fulton ’55. Reflecting on Walter’s role at the College, Fulton said, “Walter was never an official student of Hampden-Sydney College. Walter was Hampden-Sydney College.”
